The Summer School on Migration and Gender offers an interdisciplinary approach to the ways in which migration intersects with gender. Gender is a constitutive element of migration. The course will discuss both this idea, and reversing the formula, it will examine the role of migration in shaping gender, understood as relational and performative. A particular focus will be on identity in relation to human rights and law, language, labor and culture. The course is an innovative exploration among three scholars in legal studies, literature and sociolinguistics, and the students.

Each discipline brings a unique perspective on the problem and set of instruments to analyze and deepen our understanding of migration and gender.

Law is a fundamental aspect in the analysis of migration. Women have always migrated, but what has changed is so not much the number but rather the reasons why they migrate. The course will endorse a gender intersectional perspective in international human rights law in order to grasp the complexities of migration flows. It will stress how violence can determine migration, but is also an element present during migration and in the country of destination. It will look into the concept of vulnerability, discrimination and persecution, and will take into consideration climate change-induced migration.

Literature offers the imagined experience of an individual and a community, and a micro-level examination of how migration shapes identity, fuels vulnerability and influences gender performance. Literature gives voice to the marginalized; it counters assumptions, imagines the unimaginable, expresses the taboo, and opens alternatives to normative discourse. We will discuss two short novels: Adua by Igiaba Scego and On Earth We're Briefly Gorgeous by Ocean Vuong. Adua portrays the evolving self-awareness of a young Somali woman who is brought to Rome to star in a pornographic film. On Earth We're Briefly Gorgeous vividly depicts the coming-of-age of a Vietnamese boy raised in the US by a mother and grandmother whose lives were shattered by the war.

Languages are key in the migration experience. Migrants bring with them complex sociolinguistic repertoires, including languages learned through different steps on their journey. We will explore migrant trajectories, including return migration and onward migration, as well as issues of language acquisition in the destination country, and language maintenance/shift of linguistic and cultural heritage. Furthermore, we will discuss whether destination countries might fail to recognise individual accomplishments or expertise, and their attitudes towards the languages and cultures of migrants. We will explore these issues with examples from student experiences, a discussion on the movie Io sono Li (Shun Li and the Poet), a visit to a Refugee Residence in Venice, and a visit to the island of San Lazzaro, one of the most important cultural centres of the Armenian diaspora.

The program is particularly timely in this moment of history, in which migration is transforming societies and shaping gender. The course embraces both questions: migration and gender, and explores their intersection in a creative and dynamic way. Courts at all levels have started to delve into the legal question surrounding the conditions of recent migration with multiple cases of persecution, sexual exploitation, and vulnerability, and they have done so without always being able to encompass the complexity of intersectional grounds of discrimination.

The course will model the ways in which the humanities and the imagination as well as the social sciences might inform legal processes or contour legal decisions. This will play out in two ways: first in our class discussions, and second through the students' experiences of rewriting a legal decision from the perspective of what they have learned and discussed. In short, we hope that this course will educate a young generation of lawyers, academics and activists by raising awareness of many issues at the intersection of gender, migration and law.

VIU programs are characterized by interdisciplinarity and interculturalism. It is the perfect place for such an innovative project to start and develop. The course will introduce the gender rewriting for the first time as participatory exercise, combining literature, sociolinguistics and law.

Methodology and structure

The course will examine migration as a global phenomenon defined by gender, culture, socioeconomic conditions and climate, and focus on the international law which defines migration and the right to apply for asylum. The legal, sociological and sociolinguistic perspectives will be supplemented with the perspectives of two authors who examine the psychological and subjective dimensions of migration and gender in fiction.

The final session will focus on the question of how gender is shaped by migration. The class will be divided into groups to work on this idea, and the groups will present their theses in a symposium at the conclusion of the class.

Learning outcomes for participants
